Transientmind.com was created to push the limits of online creativity. An experimental forum for design made in and for the moment. Designs that are inspired by the transitory - brief, impermanent, imperfect, unstable. The site's interface - randomly chosen from one of many each time you visit - reflects this theme.

All of us approach design differently - something reflected in the variety of works featured here. There is, however, one element that all the works share - the use of new internet technology. The third dimension is something new to web design, and presents an interesting challenge for designers accustomed to thinking in 2D. The use of 3D plug-in technology contributes to the uniqueness of our experiments. Transientmind will change as we become more familiar with the possibilities these new tools present.

This site was also conceived of as a community where other designers can share their own works and opinions. Go to any experiment and you'll be able to download its source (in Mindavenue Axel format) and comment on it. We're also inviting designers to contribute related experiments (variants) and original projects to be included in Transientmind Revision 2. It's our hope that you'll see the potential of our efforts and join us in this venture.
